

Michael Tigar

Some Leading Activists

The legal activists have a broad range of personal interests, and their work reaches into many areas of the law. Alan Dershowitz, thirtythree, who teaches criminal law at Harvard, has defended Hair and I Am Curious (Yellow) against obscenity charges. "In the future we're going to have to assume that everyone will assert his rights," he says. "Maybe the system won't hold up." Michael Tigar, thirty, is at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. He has defended Yippie Abbie Hoffman and antiwar demonstrators, and was jailed for contempt during the Chicago Seven conspiracy trial. John Banzhaf III, thirty-one, a professor at George Washington University's law school, prodded Congress into banning cigarette commercials. David Sive, forty-eight, a partner in the Manhattan firm of Winer, Neuburger & Sive, became concerned about the environment "simply because I liked to hike in the woods." He has successfully opposed a chemical plant at Hilton Head Island, South Carolina, and an expressway along the Hudson River. Sive is currently representing several groups opposing an Atomic Energy Commission plan to explode a nuclear device in Alaska this fall. Edgar and Jean Camper Cahn direct organizations in Washington concerned with clinical education for lawyers and monitoring the performance of federal agencies. "Democracy can't work unless we find out where the injustices are," says Edgar Cahn. "Its failure to ask has been the profession's fundamental failure." Anthony Amsterdam, thirty-six, teaches at Stanford. He will argue cases on the constitutionality of capital punishment before the Supreme Court this fall. Gladys Kessler and Anthony Roisman, both thirty-three, are partners in Berlin, Roisman & Kessler, a leading public-interest law firm in Washington. They are active in employment discrimination and environmental-protection cases.

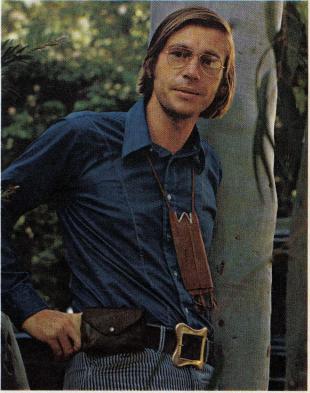

Alan Dershowitz

Anthony Roisman and Gladys Kessler

Michael Tigar

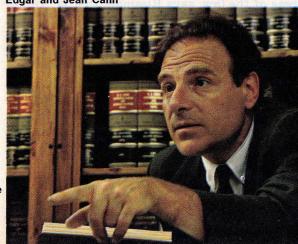

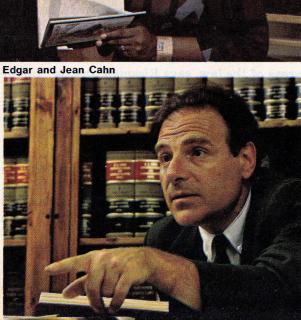

Carolina, and an expressway along the Hudson River. Sive is currently representing several groups opposing an Atomic Energy Commission plan to explode a nuclear device in Alaska this fall. Edgar and Jean Camper Cahn direct organizations in Washington concerned with clinical education for lawyers and monitoring the performance of federal agencies. "Democracy can't work unless we find out where the injustices are," says Edgar Cahn. "Its failure to ask has been the profession's fundamental failure." Anthony Amsterdam, thirty-six, teaches at Stanford. He will argue cases on the constitutionality of capital punishment before the Supreme Court this fall. Gladys Kessler and Anthony Roisman, both thirty-three, are partners in Berlin, Roisman & Kessler, a leading public-interest law firm in Washington. They are active in employment discrimination and environmental-protection cases.

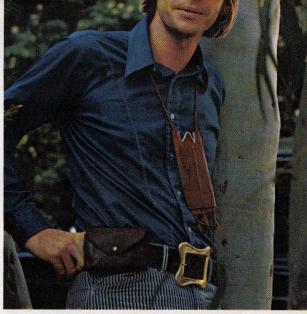

Anthony Roisman and Gladys Kessler

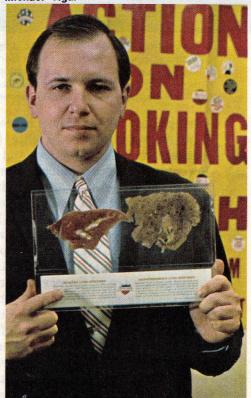

Michael Tigar

John Banzhaf III

Anthony Amsterdam

David Sive