Immigration Clinic works for families detained in Taylor, Texas

The T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility in Taylor, Texas currently detains more than one hundred immigrant families at the behest of the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency. The facility, a former medium security prison, is the subject of considerable controversy regarding the way detainees are treated. For the past year, UT Law's Immigration Clinic has worked to improve the conditions at Hutto. In this photograph, (left to right) Farheen Jan,'08, Elise Harriger,'08, Immigration Clinic Director and Clinical Professor Barbara Hines, Matt Pizzo,'08, Clinic Administrator Eduardo A Maraboto, and Kate Lincoln-Goldfinch, '08, stand outside the Hutto facility. # HOME TO TEXAS

BY TOM HENNINGER, '92

ONE OF THE GREAT strengths of UT Law is its diverse and accomplished student body. Women and men from across the country and around the world come to Texas to study. Over 250 undergraduate institutions, forty-five states plus the District of Columbia, and seventeen foreign countries are represented among the students.

In the Class of 2010—students who entered the Law School in fall 2007thirty-eight percent are Texas residents who left the state for their undergraduate educations and then returned for law school. As the saying goes, Texas has a way of reclaiming her own. All had other options for their legal educations, but they chose UT. In conversation with these students, we discovered why they came home to Texas.

Michael Addison is from San Antonio, where he graduated from St. Mary's Hall. After graduation, Addison left Texas for Yale University. "Two Yale professors had co-authored the textbook for my high school European History class, and I thought both the class and the textbook were great. I was interested in ultimately taking the professors' classes and became curious about Yale's History department," Addison said. After earning his degree in History, Addison returned to Texas for law school. When asked why he chose

UT, he said "It's a first-rate legal education, and it's nice to come home."

Daniel Aguilar spent his early years in El Paso, then his family moved to Plano where he graduated from Plano Senior High School. He earned his undergraduate degree in Economics from the University of Chicago. "Chicago is a great city: the lake, the people, the sports, the food, the arts...I could go on," said Aguilar. "And the students and professors at the school were outstanding." When asked what brought him back to Texas, he said "Cost was a factor. Texas is a good value compared to any other school of the same caliber. And I knew I would get a great legal education here."

Priscilla Noriega grew up in Brownsville and graduated from Gladys Porter High School. She majored in English Language and Literature at Yale University. Noriega thoroughly enjoyed her undergraduate experience in the Northeast, but service in Teach for America brought her—happily—back to Texas. "I knew I wanted to stay in Texas after teaching to be near my family," said Noriega. "Based on that and the fact that UT Law is simply a great school with many opportunities to learn the law through its clinics, I knew I had to come here."

Cole Evans grew up in Dallas and attended Highland Park High School. Desiring an experience outside of the familiar, Evans attended the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he majored in Business Administration. "Leaving Texas to go to UNC was one of the best decisions I ever made," said Evans. "I was blessed with great friends and experiences, and I gained much from my classes and professors." Evans feels the same way about returning to Texas and to UT for law school. "While the school's elite faculty and top-tier reputation were reasons enough, I wanted to study the law in my home state." he said.

It is indeed nice to come home, and UT Law School is a beacon for many young Texans.

THE NATIONAL SECURITY AND HUMAN RIGHTS CLINIC

BY JOHN EGAN

UT Law's new National Security and Human Rights Clinic is one of a handful of law school clinics that directly represent detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. On December 5, 2007, arguments they created will be presented before the United States Supreme Court in the Al Odah litigation, which will determine if detainees at Guantánamo have the right to present their Geneva Conventions claims in federal court.

IF THE NEW NATIONAL Security and Human Rights Clinic at UT Law adopted a slogan, it might borrow the closing phrase from the Pledge of Allegiance—"With liberty and justice for all."

The Law School launched its newest clinic at the beginning of this school year. Through practical and classroom experience, professors and students work through the intricate, highly charged legal issues surrounding the war on terrorism. The twenty students enrolled in the National Security and Human Rights Clinic this fall are teaming up with professors on an array of cases and projects that include preparing appellate briefs challenging the legality of the Detainee Treatment Act and the Military Commissions Act; directly representing some of the more than 300 "enemy combatants" detained at the U.S. military base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba; and assembling briefs and other documents in cases related to the war on terrorism.

AL ODAH ET AL.

On December 5, 2007, the United States Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in the consolidated cases of Al Odah et al. At the heart of the litigation are two questions: are Guantánamo detainees entitled to due process under United States law and the Geneva Conventions, and does the Military Commissions Act validly strip courts of jurisdiction over detainees' habeas corpus petitions?

The Military Commissions Act was authorized last year by Congress in response to the Supreme Court's ruling last year in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which declared that military commissions established to try Guantánamo detainees violated the Geneva Conventions. In this act, Congress not only authorized the President to conduct trials by military commission, but also stripped federal courts of jurisdiction to entertain petitions for habeas corpus from detainees held at Guantánamo.

UT Law students, working under the supervision of Derek Jinks, the Marrs McLean Professor in Law, drafted the judicial enforceability of the Geneva Conventions (international law) argument that will be included in the Al Odah litigation.*

* Mayer Brown LLP has created an online resource center that contains the briefs submitted at the merits stage for the combined cases Khaled A.F. Al Odah et al., v. United States of America. To read more about this litigation, please visit http://www.mayerbrown.com/probono/projects/article.asp?id=3706&nid=3156.

At the heart of the litigation are two questions: are Guantánamo detainees entitled to due process under United States law and the Geneva Conventions, and does the Military Commissions Act validly strip courts of jurisdiction over detainees' habeas corpus petitions?

"In all these cases, the government is arguing that the Geneva Conventions aren't enforceable in U.S. courts," Jinks said. "Congress arguably endorsed this view in the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 and the Military Commissions Act of 2006. But the problem with this legislation is that Congress isn't changing the relevant law, but is rather instructing the courts to ignore the law under certain circumstances."

Advocates on both sides hope that this litigation will establish what the laws say about the enforcement of treaties and habeas corpus rights.

"The challenge we faced was building an argument that the Geneva Conventions are enforceable, even with the new statutes," Jinks continued. "We did, and that argument will be heard before the Supreme Court. In the process, we discovered that not only did UT Law have the resources to build a legal clinic around these issues, but that there was also overwhelming student interest in working on these types of projects."

COLLABORATIONS AND COINCIDENCES

Jinks, an expert on international law, joined the Law School in 2005. Early on, he and a handful of students co-wrote an amicus brief he submitted in a Guantánamo detainee case. "That sparked students' interest for even more projects tied to international law and human rights," Jinks said. "Students were willing to work on the case without earning course credit, and their efforts led to the creation of a directed-study and research assistant program centered on a cluster of detainee-related legal issues."

Before returning to Austin, where he earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Texas in 1991, Jinks served on the law faculties at Harvard University, Arizona State University, the University of Chicago, Saint Louis University, and the University of Richmond. Additionally, he was an attorney in the prosecutor's office of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, a senior legal adviser and U.N. representative for the South Asia Human Rights Documentation Centre in India, and a delegate for the International Service for Human Rights at a conference aimed at establishing a permanent International Criminal Court. Since 2006, he has been a member of the U.S. Secretary of State's Advisory Committee on International Law.

Another force behind establishment of the clinic is Professor Emeritus Jack Ratliff, '62. "A few years after I retired I started looking around for a way to put my litigation and teaching experience to work in some useful way," Ratliff said. "I had several conversations with Karen Engle of the Law School's Rapoport Center, and we decided to pursue the idea of a clinic of some kind in the human rights area. It was at first just a vague notion but, after Derek Jinks got involved, we hit on the idea of taking on detainee clients referred by the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York."

"We realized that we could represent these detainees," Ratliff said. "It's a very difficult process, one with its own set of internal rules, which are quite different from regular litigation. The secrecy rules are particularly challenging. But the students are incredibly motivated—they have remarkable energy." Ratliff and Jinks were co-teachers of a practicum entitled "The Rule of Law in Wartime" in the fall of 2006. Ratliff's primary role was to act as lead counsel, advise students, and oversee the preparation of briefs and court filings.

At the same time, Scott Sullivan arrived at the Law School as part of the Emerging Scholars Program. From his scholarly work on treaty interpretation at the University of Chicago and the European University Institute, to his extensive practical experience representing Guantánamo detainees while he was at the New York firm Allen & Overy (he made more than a dozen trips to the base to meet with clients), Sullivan was uniquely positioned to contribute to the nascent initiative.

both were working on detainee-related law, the professors decided to co-teach a Rule of Law in Wartime course in the spring of 2007. Sullivan brought his Guantánamo clients from Allen & Overy—cases which would contribute significantly to the emerging Al Odah litigation. This semester, Jinks and Sullivan are co-teaching again, this time a course on national security law.

What was then known as the "Rule of Law in Wartime Project" became the National Security and Human Rights Clinic. The Law School recruited Kristine Huskey, '97, to lead the Clinic. Huskey most recently was practitioner-in-residence in the International Human Rights Law Clinic at American University's Washington College of Law in Washington DC. She began representing detainees in 2002 while at the Washington DC firm of Shearman & Sterling. One of the cases she worked on was Rasul v. Bush, which went before the U.S. Supreme Court and won the right of the detainees to challenge their detentions in federal court. (While Sullivan was at Allen & Overy, he cowrote an amicus brief for Rasul.) Today, Huskey is considered one of the country's foremost authorities on detainee-related law. In fact, one of the cases Huskey handled at Shearman & Sterling is now part of the Clinic's portfolio. She has visited Guantánamo about a dozen times in her quest to defend detainees—and the rule of law. (For more detail on Huskey's work before she joined the Law School, please see page 30.)

"This is not about whether the detainees are terrorists. We have no idea whether they're terrorists. Maybe they are, maybe they're not. This representation is about ensuring that they receive some fair process to determine whether they should continue to be detained or be released," Huskey said.

She supervises students who are representing Guantánamo detainees and are working on other cases and projects connected to national security and human rights. It is the biggest legal clinic at UT Law.

With Huskey aboard, the Law School's prominence in national security and human rights initiatives has been greatly elevated. "We've established a reputation for ourselves as one of the go-to programs on international law-related issues in the war on terror. At times, that feels more like a burden than an opportunity," Jinks said. "But when we have our heads screwed on straight about it, when we look at it in the right way, I understand that it's a tremendous opportunity. It's the blessing and curse of having a good reputation, the blessing and the curse of being relevant."

Huskey said students in the clinic are honing skills such as collaboration, interviewing, working with experts and the media, drafting, and oral and written advocacy, while also learning about the foundations of international, constitutional, and human rights law.

"We're talking about an area of law that's growing rapidly and developing in a very substantial way," said Sullivan. "The clinic gives students the opportunity to get down into the nitty-gritty of the law, and try to untangle these complicated, substantive questions in court."

"This isn't just theoretical. There are men who are waiting for us to figure out what to do," said Elizabeth Hardy, a 2007 Law School graduate who worked on Guantánamo cases as a student and now is an instructor in the clinic. She underscored the importance of the students' work: "It's important for Americans, and students especially, to realize that when we have these challenges to our civil liberties, it's our duty to make sure we protect them."

STUDENT ADVOCATES

Clinic students are divided into five teams. Two of these teams represent detainees. "They draft motions, work them into final form, and file them," Huskey said. "We recently filed several motions with the DC Circuit Court of Appeals—students are involved in litigation at the highest levels."

One such student is Shane Sanders, a third-year law student. He asked to work on the Guantánamo cases that Jinks and Sullivan were juggling last year. "This is one of the most important issues going on in the legal world today. I absolutely love the fact that I'm able to work on it now while I'm in law school," Sanders said.

Students have had the chance to, among other things, research the ability of courts to enforce self-executing treaties and dig up information for legislation addressing the release and repatriation of detainees. "In this emerging realm of the law," Hardy

The clinic's activities shouldn't amount to a monologue about security or liberty. Instead, the clinic must pursue a dialogue about maintaining equilibrium between those two concepts.

said, "students can devise an inventive legal strategy just as easily as a well-seasoned attorney can."

One team is working closely with Jinks on the various aspects of the Al-Odah litigation, another is working on the legal aspects of rendition. Through the practice of rendition, terrorism suspects are secretly moved to or kept by other countries under the umbrella of U.S. laws. The Central Intelligence Agency and other U.S. agencies operate rendition programs, with some suspects being held at clandestine "black site" prisons in other countries. Huskey said the Clinic is currently working with a DC-based agency to address the problem of rendition and how it can be subject to more judicial oversight.

The final group is described by Huskey as "the wild card team." Their time is reserved for working on rapidly emerging issues. "These students worked on the Rasul damages case and are currently working with the Office of Military Commissions regarding the use of classified information in war crimes trials," she said. "We have also started looking into the issue of international philanthropy and the war on terrorism."

And if Guantánamo shuts down, as some envision it might, then the Clinic likely will concentrate on whatever federally driven alternative arises, such as a national security court or a special terrorist court.

PATRIOTISM

Huskey knows the clinic's legal positions won't come without some criticism. In the past, she has received e-mails questioning her defense of Guantánamo detainees and her own patriotism. Both of her parents were in the military—her father fought in Vietnam—and both of her grandfathers fought in WWII, so this is not a subject she takes lightly. Huskey emphasizes that she is working to uphold the founding principles of the United States.

"I don't think it's mean-spirited or narrow-minded," Jinks said of the criticism. "It's coming from a place that makes perfect sense. But at the same time, it doesn't relieve us of the responsibility of having to think in a very careful way about how we want to strike this balance between liberty and security. Tipping the scales too far in the direction of security is not the answer. What has happened since 9/11 makes that manifestly clear."

"However," Jinks added, "it's not the right answer to simply say, 'We have off-the-shelf solutions in our constitutional law. We need not act as though the security environment hasn't changed at all.' I think that's equally a mistake."

Jinks said the Clinic's activities shouldn't amount to a monologue about security or liberty. Instead, the Clinic must pursue a dialogue about maintaining equilibrium between those two concepts.

"I care about these issues very deeply. I know that we're on the right side of this. And I think, in due course, it will be widely understood that we were on the right side of this," Jinks said. "As a consequence, we're going to be better off—we're going to be safer, we're going to be freer. We're going to strike the right balance between these two imperatives of liberty and security."

Learning the Law in 17th-Century Germany

by Emily Kadens

ONE OF THE MORE UNUSUAL books in the rare book collection of the Tarlton Law Library is the Memoriale institutionum juris of the German schoolteacher, Johannes Buno (1617–1697). The title means Memory Book of the Institutes of Law and refers in part to the famed Institutes of Justinian, the elementary law school textbook written by order of the Roman Emperor Justinian in 533 A.D. Until the nineteenth century, law students across Europe first encountered the Roman law through the Institutes and the many works copying its style and organization.

But what makes Buno's work extraordinary is how it teaches the contents of the Institutes. Published in Ratzeburg, Germany in 1672, the Memoriale is volume one of a three-volume series that uses complex pictorial mnemonics to help students memorize the content of the entire medieval corpus of the Roman law. Its author was not a lawyer, and the work can in no sense be called scholarship, but Buno's books remain a revealing milestone in the centuries-long struggle to help students learn the law.

Emily Kadens, PhD, JD, joined the faculty in 2005. She specializes in European legal history.

An illustration from the Memoriale institutionum juris [Memory Book of the Institutes of Law], the first volume in with a donation from Joseph D. Jamail, '53.

MORY

a series of three books by Johannes Buno. UT Law is the only North American library to own a copy of this rare volume. It was purchased by the Tarlton Law Library

JOHANNES BUNO WAS BORN IN 1617 IN THE Hessian town of Frankenberg in eastern Germany. He studied philosophy and theology at the University of Marburg, where he learned mnemonic techniques from his professor, Johann Balthasar Schupp. Schupp taught that mnemonics could be fruitfully applied in all academic fields, writing: "Only if people have employed this commendable art in chronology, geography, languages, titles of the law, and the bible can they do rare wonders." After completing his education, Buno worked as a private tutor for a time then taught at various finishing schools for the sons of the northern German nobility. It was while teaching that he began to develop a memory system that used pictures to help students remember text, names, and dates. He first published a mnemonic history book in 1647, followed by a mnemonic Latin grammar and a mnemonic bible.

Training students to remember the mass of Roman law presented Buno with a challenge. The Institutes is a slim volume, made up of four books, each book broken down into multiple titles, each title divided into sections. The two other major parts of the Roman law corpus, however, are much more substantial.

to cite the Roman law by heart. The way a modern lawyer practicing administrative law might know as a matter of professional necessity that 467 U.S. 837 refers to the Chevron decision, a medieval or early modern Roman lawyer-which meant virtually all educated lawyers in continental Western Europe from the thirteenth to the late eighteenth centuries would know that Digest 9.2.11.4 referred to the fragment, "If several people throw down a beam and thereby crush a slave, it seemed right to the ancient jurists that they should all be liable...," or that Codex 3.1.8 meant the law: "It has been decided that, in all things, the principles of justice and equity, rather than the strict rules of law, should be observed." Indeed, because the system of numbering the texts of the law is an early modern invention, for centuries lawyers had to learn to cite the law by its first words, often in heavily abbreviated form. Thus, de testamen. mil. l. In fraudem, finali refers to the title called De Testamento militis (On soldier's wills), which is the first title of book 29, the law (abbreviated l.) that begins "In fraudem" (fraudulently), and the final section of that law. Numerically, the law is cited as Dig. 29.1.15.6.

Keeping these texts straight required a prodigious feat

The Memoriale uses complex pictorial mnemonics to help students memorize the content of the entire medieval corpus of the Roman law.

The largest and most important work is the Digest (533 A.D.), which is a collection of excerpts of the writings of Roman jurists from the first century B.C. to the fourth century A.D. It consists of fifty books, divided into a total of 422 titles, each title composed of strings of excerpts. The third main work is the Codex (534 A.D.), composed of 4000 imperial edicts, dating from the early second century to the time of Justinian, and arranged in twelve books broken into titles.

All students of the Roman law faced the problem that the legal texts contained within the Roman law corpus did not appear in a logical order. Within each title of the Digest, the excerpts, of which there are said to be 9123, are grouped haphazardly. The fragments dealing with one issue might be found scattered throughout a title that goes on for dozens of pages. In the Codex, the edicts are arranged chronologically within each title. The Institutes is a bit easier, in part because it is shorter and more elementary. The four books cover the three canonical areas of private law: persons, things (which includes property, contract, and testaments), and actions (procedure). Nonetheless, no obvious organization compels the ordering of the titles, and the division of the books does not correspond exactly with the division into the three subject areas.

Despite the evident difficulty, lawyers needed to be able of memorization, but the educational system of the time permitted no substitute for actual knowledge, and this is where Buno stepped in to assist. He employed a letter-number-picture method of his own invention to train students not only to remember the content of each section of the Roman law but also its citation. The method achieved its fullest elaboration in the stunning copperplate by an unknown artist that serves as the pictorial part of the Institutes mnemonic. Proceeding from the most general to the most specific, the technique worked as follows.

First observe the Institutes illustration reprinted near actual size on the preceeding page. It consists of four "memory rooms," or images within which more detailed mnemonic pictures can be placed. The rooms are labeled "Lib." (abbreviation of liber, or book) I through IV. These, of course, correspond to the four books of the Institutes. To help students remember what topics each book covered, and in what order the books were arranged, Buno created the memory rooms from images that had both a topical and an alphabetical significance. Book one of the Institutes concerns persons. The image is of a teenaged boy, thus a person. The Latin word for teenaged boy is "adolescens." The "A" beginning that word is supposed to remind students that this book, about persons, is the first book of the Institutes. The memory room image for book two is of a leather sack, "bulga" in Latin. Book two deals with property, and property can be put into a sack. The third image is of a moneybag, "crumena." This book discusses contracts, which often involve money. A barrel, "dolium," with its plug knocked out represents book four. This refers to a story from Greek mythology of the fifty daughters of Danaus, whom the gods forced to atone for the sin of killing their husbands by carrying jugs of water to fill a bath (dolium). Because the bath was full of holes, the water ran out faster than they could pour it in. This is supposed to bring procedure, the topic of the book, to mind because, says Buno, "after the most difficult labors, suits are scarcely ever completed."

Next, the student must learn the order, and thereby the number, of the titles within each book. Buno facilitates this with a letter-number mechanism. His assigns each letter of the alphabet a number, A=1, B=2, C=3, all the way to V=20 (no K since it did not exist in the Latin alphabet and no U, as V and U were the same letter in Latin). Each vowel carried double duty when it appeared as the second letter of a pair. In that place, A=0, E=20, I=40, O=60, and U=80. Adding the value of two letters thus gives Buno one hundred numbers to work with: AA=1+0=1; GE=7+20=27, and so on up to VU=20+80= 100. He uses these letter combinations to create a key word representing each title for the students to memorize. Since the words appear in alphabetical order, the students should not mix up the sequence, and by remembering the words, the students remember both the order and the number of the titles. The mnemonic letters in the key words are printed in red. Here is a chart Buno supplied in his explanatory introduction:

Above each memory room in the Institutes picture, Buno includes a key word that indicates how many total titles that book contains. So, for instance, FElis in book I means 26 titles; ExpEditi in book 2 means 25.

Buno then labels every image within the memory rooms with its key word. He places those images in a double-Z pattern, with each set containing twenty images. To get the numbering correct, the student needs to "read" the images in the right order, as demonstrated in the following graphic:

Take the first quadrant of the Book 1 memory room as an example. Title one in the upper left-hand corner is an armed eagle (ArmAta Aquila). Next to the eagle are bearded gazelles (BArbatus Bubalus). Following the z-pattern down to the middle of this grouping is a chained prisoner (CAptivi CAtenis). In the bottom left-hand corner is DAphnis, the beautiful shepherd of Greek mythology. Then along the bottom row are number 5, ElAtus ob EvAngelicae, the elect or evangelists; number 6, FrAudatus creditor, the defrauded creditor; and number 7, Gubernaculum naviculae, the rudder of a ship (this and the rest of the images in this set lack the placeholding A). Proceeding back up to the middle is Herus, owner. Then the two remaining images along the top right-hand side are number 9: Indigena, native citizen, and number 10: Justa nuptia, lawful marriage.

But it is not enough for the students to learn the order of the titles. They also need to know their content. This is where Buno's elaborate images come into play. In the text that makes up the bulk of the book, he paraphrases each title in a brief story built around the mnemonic key word. A commentary in the margin explains the relevant picture. Each picture is designed to call to mind, through often humorous or punning images, the precise details of the law. The only way truly to convey Buno's creativity is to provide some examples.

THE UNTRUSTWORTHY CAT

BOOK I, TITLE 26

The last image in Book I corresponds to the title, "Untrust-worthy Guardians and Supervisors." In Roman law, children up to the age of puberty, who were not under the power of a head of family (paterfamilias), were provided the legal protection of a guardian. Between puberty and age twenty-five, minors were protected by a supervisor. This title explains who may accuse a guardian or supervisor of untrustworthiness, what constitutes improper guardianship, and the punishment therefore.

In Buno's image, the cat (FElis, the key word representing twenty-six, means "cat" in Latin) is an untrustworthy guardian of mice, as demonstrated by the cat having a mouse in its mouth. The untrustworthiness is also illustrated by the overturned goblet and cross, which symbolizes an overturned trust, because the cross is how Buno indicates trust. The cat is holding a shield, which is Buno's symbol for protection. However, the hand striking down the shield refers to the government officials who can remove an untrustworthy guardian. Anyone, even a woman, may bring an accusation of untrustworthiness. This is shown by the woman in the background hammering at a forge. Here Buno puns on similar-sounding Latin words: the woman hammers (cudit) at the forge (incudem), which sounds like incusat (to find fault with), which sounds like accusat (to accuse). A guardian is removed on account of deliberate wickedness (dolum), shown by the stick (dolo) next to the cat. However, any trial of the guardian is terminated by his death—represented by the skull. A guardian acts improperly if he acquires the position through bribery—shown by the moneybag under the shield-and even if he offers to make satisfaction for his mismanagement, he is not excused because it is the improper actions (mores) that matter, indicated by the mice (mures).

THE WISE SISTER

BOOK II, TITLE 18.

When a man disinherited or passed over his child, parents, or siblings in his will without good reason, the aggrieved persons could complain that the will was irresponsible. Buno, needing an "S" to show 18, chooses as the subject of his story the Wise and Hopeful Sister (Soror sapiens & sperans). She is represented by the stately woman on the left behind whom an anchor-notice also the little boat image—is peeking out. The anchor, Buno informs us, is a symbol of hope. The sister complains to the judge, sitting in the chair, that the will should be declared irresponsible and rescinded. This is shown by the sign above the judge, which depicts a broken pot (testa fracta), a pun on the concept of a "broken" will or testamentum fractum. The sister also acts against her brother's irresponsible will, which she holds in her hand. One could only challenge the will of a sibling if the actual assignee was a disreputable person, such as a prostitute. This is symbolized by the person (albeit a bit unclear) behind the sister, who is carrying off the family house. The two figures in the center of the image are parents (though not of the sister). They are stomping on the irresponsible will of their child. All children, whether natural, adopted, or posthumous, may complain of the irresponsible will. The natural and adopted children are depicted in the small figures by the judge's foot. The posthumous child is behind (post) the judge, lying on the ground (humi). Only a person who receives nothing from a will may bring this complaint, as indicated by the "0 rel" under the judge's chair, meaning zero bequest (relictum). A ward may bring suit on an irresponsible will, as represented by the guardian behind the judge's chair—we know he is a guardian because he is carrying a shield—who also holds the sign of the broken pot. Finally, the complainants can only obtain their pro rata share of the compulsory one-fourth of the estate that must by law go to the heirs in the case of intestacy. Buno demonstrates this with the image of part of a house placed by the judge's foot.

THE CENTURION WHO KILLED A SHE-GOAT BOOK IV, TITLE 3.

The cornerstone of the Roman law of tort was the lex Aquilia (Aquilian law). The first section of the law provides for compensation in the event of the negligent or intentional killing of slaves and livestock. The third section gives a remedy for wrongful damage to property. The law was complex and its treatment in the Institutes stuffed with details, the majority of which Buno tried to capture in his image. He names the law first with the depiction, top left, of an eagle (aquila) holding a tablet of laws with an "l" inscribed on them. As this is the third title, Buno needed a "C", which he finds in the word Centurion. The centurion killed a she-goat (capra), representing the killing of livestock, and he also killed a military servant (calo), which brings to mind a slave, shown by the small body lying on the ground at the bottom of the frame. From the centurion's sword belt hangs his moneybag, from which he would pay compensation for the injury. The Roman jurists debated at great length the reach of the lex Aquilia. One example they considered is injury done by a falling branch. The pruner was not liable if the branch fell and injured a slave passing underneath along a public way or on private land, as long as the pruner called out before the branch fell. Buno's pruner has just let a branch fall from the tree. The jurists also held that a doctor who undertook to care for a slave and neglected the aftercare would be liable. Buno symbolizes the doctor with the bottle and knife stuck between the centurion's feet. Below the tree branch, a mule-driver tramples a servant in reference to the discussion in the law of the liability of a mule driver who is too weak or inexperienced to control his team. The axle (axis) hovering above the centurion's knee and the pennant (pennus) hanging from his sword blade stand for the treatment of the lex Aquilia as a penal statute as well as a civil one. The axle (axis) and the excess of hair (crines) escaping from the centurion's hat pun on the actio criminalis, the criminal suit that could be brought for killing a slave in addition to the civil action, actio civilis-the axle plus the rather unsuccessful depiction of a cityscape (civitas) above the sword. The centurion has also wounded the second she-goat, and at the bottom of the picture, a barrel of wine has been spilled. These symbolize the third chapter of the lex Aquilia that refers to other harms. The damage owed for such wrongs was the highest price the thing had in the thirty days prior to the wrong, shown by the thirty plus the circle with a dot representing the sun, symbolizing a day.

WHY USE MNEMONICS

A common modern reaction to the Memoriale is that it must have been easier simply to learn the law than to memorize Buno's far-fetched imagery in addition. Buno had an answer to that. He put on a public showcase, quizzing eleven of his students, ranging in age from fifteen to twenty, and "of disparate intelligence and proficiency" before many learned spectators. The students acquitted themselves well. Nonetheless, despite Buno's evident pride in them, the mnemonic pictures are probably the least successful part of the book. Much more useful are his textual paraphrases of each title of the Institutes. They are brief, pick up on the key ideas, and provide a nice little story to help students put the law into a concrete context. In the process, the students would also have acquired a whole new vocabulary of obscure Latin words.

It may help one appreciate the Memoriale to know who was using it. In Germany, unlike elsewhere in Europe, seventeenth-century judges in many local courts were still laymen drawn from the lower nobility. In other words, they were precisely the men whose sons Buno was preparing to take over those same positions. Yet, while the judges were not lawyers, they were often required to apply the Roman law in all its sophistication. Although they leaned heavily on professional attorneys, whom they kept on staff, or on law professors, whom they consulted regularly, the judges likely viewed a basic knowledge of the Roman law as a prerequisite for doing their job. Since most of Buno's students would not go on to university, his course was their best opportunity to ready themselves to fulfill their traditional civic duties.

And perhaps Buno's system was not so ridiculous after all. In 1688, Christian Thomasius (1655–1728), one of the greatest legal minds of his time, wrote: "Some time ago I came across Buno's charts, which he had made about Jurisprudence. From interest, I paged through it for about two hours and here and there read through the explanation for the foolish etched images. I must acknowledge that by means of nothing but these fantasies, everything I read was imprinted on my mind, such that for a number of days I could not get them out."

LITIGATION, ACTIVISM, AND ADVOCACY:

Immigration Clinic Works for Detained Families

by Jerry de Jaager

Alerted in the summer of 2006 that immigrant families were being detained at a former prison in Taylor, Texas, UT Law's Immigration Clinic spent the last year utilizing a combination of advocacy, activism, and litigation to change life for residents at the controversial facility.

TAYLOR, TEXAS, about thirty miles from Austin, advertises itself as a "a vibrant, growing community of . . . friendly people living the good life." The community newspaper announces a farmers market, a fajita cook-off, movies in the park, and youth competitions in fishing, swimming, tennis, and miniature golf.

Amid Taylor's idyllic Americana sits the T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, a former medium security prison that now serves as a detention center for immigrant families, including children, awaiting decisions about asylum in the U.S. or other immigration-related issues. Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), a for-profit company, runs the facility. CCA is the fifth-largest operator of corrections facilities in the nation—behind only the federal government's prison system and those of three states.

When Barbara Hines, director of the Law School's Immigration Clinic, first visited the facility in the fall of 2006, she discovered that life has been anything but idyllic for the children detained there. The facility was surrounded by fences topped with razor wire. No direct sunlight entered the building. During detentions that lasted as long as a year, the children were kept in cells at least twelve hours a day, required to wear prison uniforms, given twenty minutes to eat their meals (with no additional nutrition available beyond what was served at mealtimes), and provided about one hour a day of education.

Hines, who has worked on immigration law issues for three decades, said she was stunned by the conditions she encountered at Hutto. "I have seen a lot in many years of doing immigration law that disturbed me," she said, "but this is the most disturbed I've been about any immigration policy in a really long time. I just couldn't believe that there were children in prison uniforms behind barbed wire. Imprisoning families who have fled their home countries under fear of persecution from their own governments, and detaining them in jail-like conditions, was an indescribable trauma for many of the children."

Elise Harriger, '08, a student in the Immigration Clinic who also visited

Hutto to work on cases there, was similarly distressed by what she saw. "It was a prison, plain and simple. Children, even babies, wore prison uniforms and lived in cells with narrow slits for windows. I had to keep reminding myself that I really was in the United States. It seemed so terribly wrong," Harriger recalled.

According to advocates, there was little or no privacy in bathrooms or showers at Hutto. Many of the children said that they were threatened with being separated from their parents if they did not respond immediately to the orders of their uniformed guards. There was no pediatrician onsite, and many children's medical conditions worsened while they were in custody. Advocates say the children had virtually no toys or age-appropriate books and were not allowed to keep writing implements and paper in their cells. In many cases, the children's mental health deteriorated substantially.

None of the detainees were charged with crimes, and none had violent histories. Among them were families from Lithuania, Romania, Iraq, Somalia, and several Latin American countries.

CALLS FOR ASSISTANCE

The Hutto facility opened in May of 2006. Frances Valdez, '05, who was then the Clinic's Clinical Fellow, began receiving calls for assistance in August. Because the detainees have no right to a publicly funded lawyer, the Clinic fields many such requests—it is one of very few organizations with expertise in this area that provides free legal services. Valdez recalled, "The first call I got was from a frantic Nicaraguan woman in the Valley saying her daughter and her daughter's baby were being held at a prison in Taylor. That was when we first learned families were being detained at Hutto."

As Clinic students began meeting with Hutto detainees to help them with their asylum claims and other cases, Valdez also worked to raise public awareness of those detainees' circumstances. At an Austin meeting convened by the national organization Detention Watch Network to discuss general detention issues, she asked those in attendance to focus on Hutto, and the group Texans United for Families was formed as a result. In December of 2006, Valdez and others organized a vigil at Hutto, and that event ignited media attention. Valdez recalled, "Suddenly we were receiving calls from everywhere, not just Texas media but national media, too."

With twelve students, the Immigration Clinic could handle only a relatively small number of cases for individual Hutto detainees. "We were overwhelmed," Hines recalled. "We realized that we were going to need more help." Other organizations providing individual services, such as the American Civil Liberties Union, were also finding their resources barely sufficient to meet the needs of individuals there.

THE LITIGATION

In March of this year, the Immigration Clinic, along with the American Civil Liberties Union and the international law firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, filed lawsuits on behalf of twenty-six children detained at Hutto against Michael Chertoff, secretary of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security (DHS), and six officials from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). The lawsuits charged that the children were being imprisoned under inhumane conditions, and in contravention of a 1997 federal settlement agreement, Flores v. Meese, that requires immigration authorities to house children in the least restrictive conditions possible and to meet certain basic standards in their care and treatment. All twelve students from the Immigration Clinic participated in developing the case.

In an April ruling consolidating the twenty-six cases into one trial, the District Court Judge hearing the case—1963 Law School graduate Sam Sparks—warned the defendants that they faced an uphill struggle to justify their actions, writing: "The Court finds it inexplicable that Defendants have spent untold amounts of time, effort, and taxpayer dollars to establish the Hutto family detention program, knowing all the while that Flores is still in effect."

In an apparent response to the suit, ICE accelerated the process of issuing bonds for asylum seekers who passed interviews regarding their credible fear of harm or repression if they returned to their native countries. Those bonds freed some of the detainees and their children from the facility.

Other changes also began taking place at Hutto after the suit was filed, changes that former Clinic student Elizabeth Wagoner, '07, described as nearly farcical. "It would have been funny if it weren't so tragic," Wagoner recounted. "For example, they painted a big mural on one wall, with castles and happy dragons and blue skies and puffy clouds, and it said Bienvenidos a Hutto—Welcome to Hutto—as though this would bring some sort of pleasure to children who were, in my view, being cruelly mistreated and many of whose parents were experiencing serious distress as a result of their penal confinement and the confinement of their children."

"The conditions at Hutto are not just distressing, they are fundamentally in conflict with what Congress intended as a proper way to deal with detained families."

THE SETTLEMENT

As the trial was about to begin in August, a settlement was reached. All twenty-six of the plaintiff children had been released before the trial date—six of them just days earlier. They are still in the U.S., now living with family members who are U.S. citizens and/or legal permanent residents while their asylum claims are being pursued.

The defendants agreed to insure that living conditions at Hutto—where, as of the writing of this article, approximately 200 people are still detained—met appropriate standards. U.S. Magistrate Judge Andrew Austin, '85, was assigned to monitor those conditions, pursuant to a 127-item checklist included in the settlement.

"In my opinion, Hutto should be shut down," Valdez said. "But at least now the children can wear regular clothes instead of prison uniforms, they can go outside, and there are no more clanging iron cellblock gates."

Hines and her students still provide legal services to individuals detained at Hutto. Even with the settlement in place and changes beginning to occur, Hines said that it is still very difficult to go there and see families held in such confinement. "The conditions at Hutto are not just distressing," she said. "They are fundamentally in conflict with what Congress intended as a proper way to deal with detained families."

THE POLICY

Before 2001, apprehended immigrant families (a category that includes asylum seekers, who are placed under arrest and considered to be in the U.S. illegally until their status is determined) most typically were released with an assigned date to appear in court. After 2001, in an environment that placed heightened emphasis on security, government policy called for the detention of more apprehended immigrants, including those accompanied by children, to provide a greater likelihood that they would appear for their court dates.

The first facility to house detained immigrant families was established in a former nursing home in Berks County, Pennsylvania in 2001. With about eighty-four beds, it is run by the county. The much larger Hutto is the only other facility used to detain families.

In a joint report published earlier this year, the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service and the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, while declaring "the system of family detention is overwhelmingly inappropriate for families," observed that children at the Berks County institution were generally treated more humanely than those held at Hutto.

The House committee overseeing the budget for the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has regularly described detention of families as a last resort. In 2005 it wrote: "The Committee expects DHS to release families or use alternatives to detention such as the Intensive Supervised [sic] Appearance Program whenever possible. When detention of family units is necessary, the committee directs DHS to use appropriate detention space to house them together." In the Intensive Supervision Appearance Program, currently underway in nine American cities, immigrants are generally equipped with electronic bracelets and supervised by caseworkers to insure compliance with the terms of their release.

In 2006 the committee reiterated its expectation that "if detention is necessary," DHS should "house these families together in non-penal, homelike environments until the conclusion of their immigration proceedings."

Hines and her students take pride in the services they provide to individual Hutto detainees, and in their substantial part in obtaining the settlement that is changing the conditions of detention there. But many feel strongly that detention of families is an inappropriate policy and that even if detention must be used, the Hutto facility is the wrong place to do it.

"I learned some important lessons about the law through this experience," said Wagoner, in words that are echoed by the other Clinic students. "First, I got to see how a great practitioner like Professor Hines can make the law work quickly to address a big problem. And second, we all saw that there are larger matters of policy that can only be addressed through advocacy and activism beyond litigation. I know that for me, and I think for all of us, those are lessons that will make us better and more effective attorneys no matter what kind of legal practice we pursue in the long run."

Barbara Hines, Director of the Immigration Clinic and Clinical Professor

A 1969 UT graduate, Barbara Hines earned her JD from Northeastern University School of Law in 1975 and then went to work as a staff attorney at the Legal Aid Society of CentralTexas in Austin. Her undergraduate degree was in Latin American Studies and she also studied Spanish at UT's graduate school in 1970. "On my first day at work," she recounted, "an immigration case came in, someone said 'You speak Spanish,' and my career focus was established."

She did not regret that focus, since she had a deep affection for Mexico and other Latin American countries, having grown up in Brownsville and lived in Mexico City for a time before she started college. Immigration issues are a subject about which she cares deeply, influenced by her parents' escape from Nazi Germany.

At the Legal Aid Society of CentralTexas she rose to the position of managing attorney, supervising five attorneys. In 1982, she opened a private legal practice specializing solely in immigration law; in 1991 she co-founded the Texas Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, litigating immigration-related impact cases throughout the state; and in 1999 she joined the UT Law School as director of the Immigration Clinic. (The law firm she founded continues as Hines and Leigh; she is Of Counsel there.)

Named as one of 100 "legal legends" by Texas Lawyer magazine, Hines maintains ties with many immigration law organizations and writes widely on immigration law topics. She has earned two Fulbright Scholarships to conduct research and teach in Argentina, where she is helping establish an immigration clinic at the Center for Legal and Social Studies, a leading human rights organization, in conjunction with the University of Buenos Aires Law School.

"The Law School has been very, very supportive of my work, and I'm most grateful for that," Hines said. "I feel fortunate to be able to mentor a next generation of advocates for these important rights."

Clinic student Kate Lincoln-Goldfinch, '08, is one of many who express deep appreciation for Hines's qualities as a teacher and as a person. "I feel very blessed to have her as a role model, and she has shaped my understanding of what a great legal career could be," Lincoln-Goldfinch said. "To have her level of skill and experience and still care as deeply and passionately as she does, to supervise us so expertly on cases that affect human lives and still let us take responsibility for what we are doing—it's all an incredible blend, and something no one who has studied under Professor Hines could ever forget."

OTHER

In 2006 George Fleming, '71, helped the Law School with what students said was a most pressing need: the renovations of the school café. His generous donation transformed a basement space into the lively and popular George's Café. Fleming and Dean Larry Sager seized upon the idea of decorating the walls of the new café with photographs of other establishments in Texas that carry the name "George." They asked renowned photographer Margot Herster to explore this bit of Texana. Here are a few examples. To see all of them, you must visit George's Café at UT Law.

DANIEL BIROPRIGUEZ Positive Political Theorist

UT LAW IS PLEASED to welcome Professor Dan Rodriguez, a former law school dean at the University of San Diego and a leading scholar in the area of law and public policy.

Rodriguez served as dean of the University of San Diego's law school from 1998 to 2005. During his tenure, the school rose in stature regionally and nationally, securing its reputation as one of the leading private law schools in California and the western United States.

Previously, Rodriguez was a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law. At USD and UC, Berkeley, he taught a wide variety of courses in the public law area, including administrative law, state and local government law, legislation, constitutional law, and statutory interpretation.

After stepping down as dean at USD, he began looking for ways to "get out of his comfort zone." Rodriguez, and his wife and colleague, Leslie Oster, who now serves the Law School as assistant dean for strategic planning, had spent their entire lives in California, except for the three years that Rodriguez was a student at Harvard Law School. Both were excited about the prospect of moving to Texas. "I have long admired the Law School and its faculty from a distance," Rodriguez said. "UT is a great research and public university. And I take seriously the mission of the University to provide assistance to the government at both the state and local levels. I have an interest as both a resident of Texas and as an expert in this field."

"Few things could possibly give me, as the dean of the UT School of Law, more pleasure than announcing the appointment of Dan Rodriguez to our faculty," said Dean Lawrence Sager. "Dan is a star, and he brings many gifts with him. To the faculty he brings his formidable capacity as an imaginative, wide-ranging, interdisciplinary scholar; to the students he brings his equally formidable capacity as a classroom teacher and the example of his already enormously distinguished career; to the state of Texas he brings his hands-on interest in politics and governance."

Rodriguez is one of the key original figures in the area of legal scholarship known as Law and Positive Political Theory, which lives at the intersection of law and political science. This area of study relies heavily on interdisciplinary work with the social sciences, and a sign of this can be seen in the fifty-plus articles Rodriguez has co-authored with scholars from other disciplines. "Its focus is how the social sciences look at political institutions, from city councils to judges interpreting statutes," he said.

Many of the issues addressed by Law and Positive Political Theory are current hot-button issues around the state and the nation, including education, infrastructure, fiscal policy, education finance, and immigration. Rodriguez's recent articles have been published in the Northwestern and University of Pennsylvania law reviews and in the Journal of Contemporary Legal Issues. An excerpt from one of these articles appears on the following page.

Rodriguez is also the author of a forthcoming casebook on state constitutional law, to be published by Aspen Press, and the co-author of a volume on disaster mitigation policy, recently published by the Environmental Law Institute Press.

He is an elected member of the American Law Institute and the American Bar Foundation and has received numerous honors and awards during his career. Rodriguez received a JD with honors from Harvard Law School in 1987 and a BA from California State University-Long Beach in 1984.—TH

This article is an excerpt from "The Paradox of Expansionist Statutory Interpretations," an article by Daniel B. Rodriguez and Barry R. Weingast, originally published in the Northwestern University Law Review, Volume 101 (2007), pp. 1209–11.

THE PARADOX OF EXPANSIONIST STATUTORY INTERPRETATIONS

MANY CITIZENS want both Congress to pass more progressive legislation and the courts to interpret existing legislation in a progressive manner, for example, by expanding the scope and coverage of these regulatory statutes. Though progressives pursue these agendas side-by-side, our analysis reveals that progressives can realize only one of these two events. A tradeoff exists between these two strategies; that is, as courts pursue broad interpretations of progressive legislation, Congress is less likely to enact new progressive legislation. We call this insight the paradox of judicial expansionism: Expansionary reading of existing statutes by judges inhibits congressional passage of new progressive legislation.

This logic follows from a key feature of legislative politics. The standard legal approach to legislation is built on an implicit fiction, namely, that in the production of new statutes, two sides or groups of legislators vie for votes of unaligned legislators. If the opponents win, the status quo is preserved; if proponents win, the new legislation passes. This standard approach illustrates that to understand the meaning of an act, one ought to look to pronouncements of the proponents who wrote the legislation and shepherded it through the legislative process. After all, the proponents who wrote the legislation and negotiated its passage should be the most knowledgeable about the legislation's contents.

This fiction gives a false picture of the legislative process and, worse, precludes us from understanding how statutes are crafted through compromise. Rather than simply winning moderate legislators to their side, proponents of legislation typically must compromise with the moderates whose support is necessary to create a majority coalition. These compromises materially transform the text of a proposal that will not pass into one that does. These compromises are thus central to the production of legislation and to its meaning; and, to the extent that statutory interpretation is viewed as a search for legislative meaning, these compromises are central to an informed study of statutory meaning and legislative intent.

This perspective on coalitions and compromises implies that, looking to what the proponents say about the legislation, particularly what they say prior to the central compromises necessary to produce the legislation, can be quite misleading about the final legislation's meaning. In many ways, bargains between proponents and moderates compromise the proponents' goals, for example, by making exceptions, by restricting the scope of the legislation's coverage, or by creating cumbersome procedures. By hypothesis, proponents view these compromises as preferable to the status quo; if proponents did not, the legislation would simply fail. And, critically, these compromises are essential for the moderates to support the legislation. Therefore, to understand the contours of the ultimate legislative bargain, it is important to understand the nature and scope of the compromise that enabled the bargain to pass Congress.

Enter the courts in the late 1960s and 1970s. Federal courts expanded a wide range of regulatory and other statutes. Moreover, the means by which they did so typically involved undoing the compromises necessary to gain the moderates' support. . . Expansionist judicial behavior has a direct feedback effect on congressional politics. By undoing the compromises necessary to secure an act's passage, courts effectively tell the moderates that they cannot have their compromises. When courts regularly set aside moderate compromises, moderates come to realize that a vote today for the moderate version is likely to result later in an expanded version. Expansionist courts therefore force moderates to choose between the expanded, uncompromised version of the legislation, and the status quo. To the extent that moderates are only willing to support the legislation with the compromises intact, they will vote for the status quo and the legislative initiatives will thereby be defeated.

Our approach implies that the courts' expansionist interpretations of the social legislation of the 1960s and 1970s have inhibited moderate legislators from working with other legislators to craft similar compromises. To put our thesis simply, legislators whose assent is critical in reaching statutory bargains are dissuaded from agreeing to support new legislation insofar as they believe that the courts will unravel these bargains to pursue broader agendas than the legislation allows. We suggest, therefore, a major paradox: Judicial efforts to pursue progressive aims through 'dynamic' statutory interpretations make it much less likely that the very progressive legislation that anchors such legal interpretations will see the light of day. This approach thus helps explain why the era of progressive legislation was bounded: The courts made the types of compromises necessary to produce this legislation untenable, helping to bring the era to an end.

Harrington Fellows

The Donald D. Harrington Fellows Program at UT-Austin is the most prestigious program of its kind in the nation. The program supports approximately five Fellows each academic year. These Fellows, placed in colleges across the campus, pursue their research and collaborate with UT faculty members. For more information on the Harrington Fellows Program, visit its website at http://www.utexas.edu/harrington/faculty/legacy/index.html.

Mark Greenberg

PROFESSOR MARK GREENBERG came to UT Law in January 2007 and will complete his Harrington Fellowship at the end of the calendar year. Greenberg, an acting professor of law and assistant professor of philosophy at UCLA School of Law, is an expert in the interdisciplinary field of law and philosophy. Much of his work is in philosophy of mind and language, as well as in criminal law. He earned his undergraduate degree at Johns Hopkins University, the JD at UC, Berkeley, and two degrees from Oxford University, including the D Phil in philosophy.

Following law school, Greenberg served as law clerk to Ruth Bader Ginsburg, at that time a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the DC Circuit. He spent several years working as a Deputy Assistant Attorney General at the Department of Justice, working on criminal and prosecutorial policy, religious freedom, and appellate litigation strategy. Greenberg also worked as a federal prosecutor. Prior to joining the faculty at UCLA, he taught philosophy at Princeton University.

At Texas, Greenberg has continued his work on his current legal philosophy project, The Prism of Rules. This project studies the most fundamental question of law and philosophy—the relationship between law and morality. "The Harrington Fellowship is a huge luxury," Greenberg said. "It has provided me with the opportunity to meet and work with outstanding faculty, both at the Law School and in the Department of Philosophy, and to concentrate on writing."

Greenberg, who is married to the British author Andrea Ashworth, with whom he has a daughter, is looking forward to his return to UCLA. But he says he'll miss his temporary home here. "Texas, Austin, and the Law School are wonderfully friendly places," Greenberg said. "My family and I have very much enjoyed our time here."

Niko Matouschek

PROFESSOR NIKO MATOUSCHEK arrived at UT Law School this fall as a Harrington Fellow for the 2007 academic year. Matouschek, a native of Germany, earned his bachelor's, master's, and doctorate degrees at the London School of Economics. His area of scholarly interest concerns the economics of contracts and organizations, an interdisciplinary study that involves law and economics. Matouschek creates theoretical models that explore a variety of questions, such as why some businesses are large, others small, some centralized, others decentralized, and why some contracts—for example, the marriage contract—are used over time and across cultures, while others are not. These models are then available for testing through empirical study.

Matouschek is on leave for a year from the Kellogg School of Management at Northwestern University, where he is an assistant professor in the Department of Management and Strategy. Prior to his appointment at Northwestern, Matouschek taught at the London School of Economics, was a visiting researcher at the Stockholm School of Economics, and was a summer associate with McKinsey & Company during his university studies.

While Matouschek says he never expected to be in Texas, he already appreciates the Law School's "intellectually stimulating environment," and he's "looking forward to winter outside of Chicago." Another perk of the Harrington Fellowship for Matouschek is that it places him in the same city as his wife. This past summer, he married Shana Bernstein, a professor of History at Southwestern University, whom he met at Northwestern while she was studying there on a post-doctoral fellowship.—TH

2007–2009 Emerging Scholars

The Emerging Scholars Program at UT Law School identifies and recruits promising new legal scholars to the University of Texas School of Law for a two-year program offering teaching experience, research assistance, and faculty mentoring.*

Stuart Chinn

STUART CHINN JOINS the faculty at UT Law after having earned four degrees in seven years from Yale University. Chinn holds the BA, MA, and MPhil degrees in Political Science, and a JD degree. He is now working on his dissertation for a fifth degree from Yale—a PhD in Political Science. His dissertation is entitled "After Victory: Institutional Recalibration and Political Change." Chinn's research interest is in the area of constitutional theory, and particularly the impact of constitutional law on the political system.

Chinn was born and raised in Eureka, California to parents who both fled China during the Cultural Revolution. His father is a physics professor, and his mother is a well-known community volunteer—she was recently recognized for years of service to the homeless.

Chinn interviewed with Professors William Forbath, Scot Powe, and H.W. Perry, among others, before accepting a slot in the program. "Stuart is a wonderful young interdisciplinary scholar at the intersection of law, history, and political science," said Forbath. "That's an intersection where several of us here at the Law School also work; and we think his time here will be rewarding for us as well as for him. He's got great range and ambition and already has major work underway."

He is also, rumor has it, a gifted poker player—as several members of the faculty found out recently to their financial detriment.

This fall, Chinn is conducting a seminar on American constitutional development, and will teach a course in legislation next spring. "Texas is an excellent law school, with an impressive and accomplished faculty," said Chinn. "The Emerging Scholars Program is a good opportunity for me to hone my teaching skills, conduct my research, and interact with truly outstanding legal scholars and law students."

Ian Farrell

IAN FARRELL COMES TO US from around the world. He grew up in Gerringong, Australia—a small coastal town south of Sydney—where his passions included surfing. His father was a primary school teacher and his mother a nurse. Farrell earned his undergraduate degree in mathematics and computer science from the University of Wollongong, followed by a law degree from the same school. He then attended Harvard Law School on a Fulbright Fellowship where he earned the LLM, and afterwards clerked for Judge Benjamin Kaplan on the Massachusetts Appeals Court. After his time in Boston, Farrell backpacked for a year through Africa, China, India, and Tibet, among other places.

Farrell is not a newcomer to the UT-Austin campus—he earned a master's degree in philosophy from UT in 2003. While he was here, he participated in the joint Law & Philosophy program between the Law School and the Department of Philosophy, directed by UT Law professor Brian Leiter. Farrell then taught at his alma mater, Wollongong, before returning to Texas this fall.

"Ian is yet another wonderful addition to the Emerging Scholars Program," said Professor Mitch Berman. "Not only is he smart and learned in a variety of fields—including jurisprudence and comparative constitutionalism—but he's also a delight to be around."

Farrell noted that his interest in the Emerging Scholars Program stems from his positive interaction with the students and faculty during his studies at UT, as well as the caliber of the faculty in his areas of interest, Constitutional Law and Jurisprudence. He is teaching courses on both of those subjects during the fall and spring semesters. —TH

ARIEL DULITZKY

Teaching the Practice of Human Rights Law

AFTER FIFTEEN YEARS at the forefront of human rights advocacy, Ariel Dulitzky has joined the University of Texas as Visiting Professor in Law and Latin American Studies and Associate Director of the Audre and Bernard Rapoport Center for Human Rights and Justice.

"As one of the top lawyers in his field, Ariel's addition to the Center is certain to expand both our depth and breadth, and help us accomplish our goal of becoming the premier institution in the world for the study of human rights and Latin America," said Karen Engle, director of the Rapoport Center.

In his most recent position, Dulitzky was assistant executive secretary of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, which is an autonomous arm of the Organization of American States. There, he led the preparation of reports concerning human rights and the rule of law within the thirty-five OAS member countries, drafted special reports on particular rights topics, and acted as technical advisor to the OAS Working Group that is discussing the adoption of a new inter-American convention against racial discrimination. He supervised a team of about twenty-five attorneys that dealt with a docket of more than a thousand claims of human rights abuses brought to the Commission, and directed the litigation of more than seventy cases in front of the Inter-American Court on Human Rights.

Dulitzky grew up in Argentina during the period of military dictatorship known as the "dirty war," a conflict characterized by widespread human rights abuses and the deaths of an estimated 30,000 persons who were perceived as opponents of the ruling junta. Two of his mother's cousins were among the desaparecidos of Argentina—those who were kidnapped and never heard from again. He entered the University of Buenos Aires School of Law, where he became editor of the law review as democracy was returning to the country.

"It was a time when we thought deeply about what human rights really meant and how to promote and protect them through legal and political action," Dulitzky recalled. "I was fortunate as a law student to have some great professors who helped me and many classmates to become human rights advocates and practitioners. Now, I hope to help train the new generation of human rights advocates in the United States."

To do that, he intends not only to provide strong classroom instruction but also to create expanded opportunities for practical experience for students, and for research, scholarship, and collaboration among faculty members. For example, he sees openings for student and faculty involvement in at least two of the projects he's working on—the drafting of the new OAS convention against racial discrimination, and a large multi-university project to train judges, prosecutors, and public defenders throughout Latin America in human rights law.

Earlier this year Harvard Law School, from which Dulitzky earned an LLM in 1999, honored him with its Gary Bellow Public Service Award, for "inspirational commitment to public interest work and an innovative approach to lawyering in the interest of promoting justice." After attending Harvard he directed Latin American programs at the International Human Rights Law Group (now known as Global Rights), which assists local activists in challenging injustice, and he served as co-executive director of the Center for Justice and International Law, the largest nongovernmental organization dedicated to the implementation of human rights norms in Latin America.

He is teaching a fall course, Human Rights in Latin America, and a spring one, Advanced Human Rights Advocacy, both cross-listed with the Law School and Latin American Studies. "I am very impressed with the students from what I have seen so far, and very pleased with the faculty's interest in collaboration with human rights initiatives. I hope that through the Rapoport Center's different projects we will make a real difference in the world, and transform the University of Texas into one of the best places to learn the practice of human rights law."

He is married to Denise Gilman, a clinical professor at the Law School who teaches in the Immigration Clinic.—IdeJ

DENISE GILMAN

Advocates for Immigrants

DENISE GILMAN, THE NEW clinical professor in the Immigration Clinic, grew up in the Austin area. Her father, a photographer, was taken by Mexico's beauty and brought his family there for several weeks each year while he created images of people and of vivid walls decorated with folk art.

"That may be when I started developing a commitment to the rights of people from other societies," Gilman recalled. She went off to the Midwest for college, but she returned to Austin in the summers, and she worked several of those summers in the law office of Barbara Hines, a prominent immigration lawyer and activist who has led the Law School's Immigration Clinic since 1999.

Her experience with Hines reinforced her commitment to work as a lawyer in human rights and immigration settings. After graduating from Columbia Law School—having received its Rosenman Award for leadership and public interest scholarship—and then clerking for Judge Thomas M. Reavley at the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, she joined the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, an arm of the Organization of American States, as a human rights specialist. Among other things, she was the lead lawyer before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in a prominent case, in which it was shown that the Guatemalan government was responsible for the clandestine detention, torture, and extrajudicial execution of a Guatemalan activist married to U.S. lawyer Jennifer Harbury. The case received broad attention when it was further revealed that a Guatemalan official involved in the torture had been on the payroll of the CIA.

From there she became director of the Mexico Project at the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights (now called Human Rights First), where her primary focus was on issues related to torture in the Mexican criminal justice system. "Unfortunately, the use of torture to obtain confessions continues to be prevalent in Mexico," Gilman noted. Her work involved close collaboration with Mexican human rights lawyer Digna Ochoa who, after leaving Mexico for her safety and living for a time with Gilman in the United States, was killed shortly after her return to Mexico in 2001.

In 2000 Gilman became director of the Immigrant and Refugee Rights Project at the Washington [DC] Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights and Urban Affairs. In that role she led the advocacy that resulted in an act requiring the District government to provide services in languages other than English—only the third such language-access law in the country—and she created a report on relations between the police and the Latino community that led to significant policy changes. She received the Community Outreach Recognition and Opportunity Award from the District of Columbia courts for that work, and she also was presented with an Excellence in Lawyering Award from the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

From 2005 to 2007 she was a clinical teaching fellow in the Center for Applied Legal Studies at Georgetown University Law Center, where she co-taught a political asylum clinic and earned an LLM.

At the Immigration Clinic, she is helping students handle asylum cases and claims under the Violence Against Women Act, and she is helping broaden the Clinic's work to include more of an international human rights perspective. With her guidance, Clinic student Elise Harriger, '08, recently submitted a briefing paper to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights arguing that the detention of immigrant families, including small children, at the T. Don Hutto detention center in Taylor, Texas violates international human rights standards. (See related story, page 16.)

"To return to Austin and work alongside Barbara Hines with such extraordinary and dedicated students is a great thrill for me," Gilman said. "The programs, scholarship, and centers focused on human rights here at UT Law are world class, and I am so very appreciative to be able to be part of all that," she said.

She is married to visiting law professor Ariel Dulitzky, who is also associate director of the Audre and Bernard Rapoport Center for Human Rights and Justice.—JdeJ

KRISTINE HUSKEY

Director of the National Security and Human Rights Clinic

ON DECEMBER 26, 2004, Kristine Huskey, '97, boarded a ten-seat turboprop bound for Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. She was going to meet with her then clients, twelve Kuwaiti citizens who were being held at the United States military base there. It was the first of twelve (thus far) trips she has made to meet with clients—many of whom have been held without charge for years.

On arriving at the base, Huskey is met with obligatory military escorts and searches of her belongings. These searches invariably turn up the pamphlet-size copy of the United States Constitution that's always tucked in her bag.

The schedule is strict and inflexible. Huskey meets with her clients, whose leg chains are connected to a bolt in the floor, for carefully apportioned amounts of time. "As a lawyer who used to work at a big DC firm, and meet with corporate in-house counsel at places like the Four Seasons," Huskey said, "representing Guantanamo detainees is quite a different experience."

In accepting her new position as director of the National Security and Human Rights Clinic, Huskey is taking on some considerable legal challenges. An important part of the clinic's caseload is representing detainees at Guantánamo.

Derek Jinks, the Marrs McLean Professor in Law, said Huskey's wealth of experience with detainee cases while she worked in Washington, as well as her overall legal prowess, lay the foundation for the Clinic. "All of the prominent detainee cases that have been handed down by the Supreme Court have her fingerprints all over them," Jinks said.

Before earning her JD from UT Law in 1997, Huskey lived for two years in Luanda, Angola. At the time, civil war was raging in the African nation. Food was in short supply, and few people spoke English. "So I learned how to speak Portuguese," Huskey said. "I learned how to make bread. I learned how to live without a telephone, running water, electricity, air conditioning-things most of us take for granted."

Huskey saw firsthand what areas of armed conflict look like. "It's a lot more varied than you might expect," she said. "All kinds of different people get caught up in it—business people, visiting aid workers, travelers, citizens, civilians—the vast majority of whom are not involved in the conflict at all. That experience really helped me understand that sometimes people are just in the wrong place at the wrong time. One of the great strengths of our legal system is that due process can separate the genuinely bad actors from the merely unlucky."

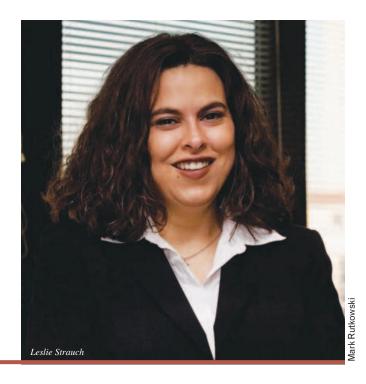

Upon returning from Angola, Huskey enrolled at Columbia University in New York City. In 1992, she graduated Phi Beta Kappa with a bachelor's degree in Political Science. Her experience in Angola was part of the reason she ultimately chose to go to law school. Following her graduation from UT, she clerked for Justice Bea Ann Smith, '75, on the Third Court of Appeals in Austin, then joined Shearman & Sterling LLP in Washington DC, where she represented international entities including OPEC and the Mexican tomato industry.

In 2002 she began working on detainee cases with Tom Wilner, her mentor at Shearman & Sterling. Wilner agreed to represent several families of Kuwaiti detainees at Guantánamo after ten other DC law firms had declined. Rumblings of discontent from inside and outside the firm ensued. "Tom basically threatened to quit if we were not allowed to continue representing these people, because we had made a commitment to them and to standing up for the rule of law," Huskey recalled. Wilner remained at the firm and continued working on the detainee cases. By 2004, their case had been heard by the Supreme Court as part of Rasul v. Bush, a decision that helped reestablish habeas corpus for detainees. Huskey brings this hard-won experience to UT Law.

The Clinic's goals are to teach students how to be principled practitioners, and to impart lessons about contributing to the legal community and to society in the very significant debate involving national security.—[E

LESLIE STRAUCH

Children's Rights Champion

LESLIE STRAUCH, A 1995 graduate of the Law School and 1992 graduate of the University, was recently appointed Supervising Attorney in the Children's Right Clinic. She brings to her new responsibilities eight years' experience as a Travis County Assistant District Attorney representing Child Protective Services and four years before that doing similar work in the office of the El Paso County Attorney, where she also prosecuted juvenile cases.

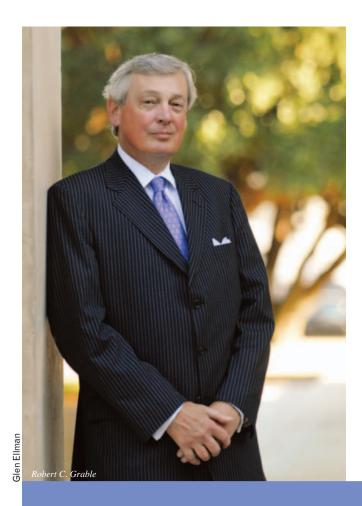

She arrived in El Paso, fresh out of law school, with little awareness of issues related to the abuse and neglect of children, but as she experienced the plight of the children in the cases she handled, a passion for children's rights quickly took hold. "Growing up in San Antonio I was lucky enough to only know the letters 'CPS' as standing for the public utility, City Public Service, not for Child Protective Services," she said. "My experience in El Paso convinced me that cases involving children are the most important ones that are heard in the courthouse. They don't get as much publicity on television or in newspapers as some other cases, but they can protect young lives that are being shattered through no fault of their own."

"I didn't really expect to become a litigator during law school," she added, "but it was important to me to be able to stand up for these children. I'm proud to say that I have been able to help children in terrible circumstances, some that were being sexually abused by both their parents, one that was in a home with a mother who had already been accused of—and later was convicted of—killing her other child. In some ways the cases all run together as a nightmare of horrors, and in other ways each one is indelibly individual."

Because her passion is backed up by deep expertise, Strauch often is asked to speak at seminars and workshops for legal practitioners. The groups she has addressed include the Texas County and District Attorney's Association, Court Appointed Special Advocates of Travis County, and Court Appointed Family Attorneys.

Through an innovative program at the Travis County District Attorney's Office, she also served as a part-time community prosecutor, joining Austin police officers in visiting communities to help prevent crime, raise public awareness of criminal justice services, and put a more human and compassionate face on law-enforcement officials. Working primarily in Southeast Austin, she attended community meetings to discuss ways to make neighborhoods safer. "All too often people know law enforcement only as the people who make arrests and lock people up. It was very gratifying to show that we can help to proactively make things better," she said.

At the Children's Rights Clinic she helps students with the practicalities and nuances of successful advocacy, guiding them in skills that include interviewing clients, preparing cases, engaging with opposing lawyers, and making presentations to judges. "It's great to see such a phenomenal group of young people taking on this important work," she said, "and the Law School's commitment to the quality of their clinical experience is very impressive to me. It's one thing to offer clinics, but it's another to strongly back them with resources and respect, the way it's done here. Some of the Clinic students might make careers in this aspect of the law, and that will be wonderful. And some may work elsewhere, but maybe they'll be more inclined to take cases like this as part of their pro bono opportunities. In any event, the legal world is gaining some gifted, committed young attorneys with excellent lawyering skills."—IdeJ

UT Law Welcomes the New Foundation Board President: Bob Grable

BOB GRABLE, '71, A PARTNER in Kelly Hart & Hallman LLP, has been elected president of The University of Texas Law School Foundation Board of Trustees, effective November 2007. Grable was elected to the Board in 2002, and he has served as its vice-president since 2005.

At Kelly Hart & Hallman, Grable heads the Energy practice group, and is one of the firm's seven founding members. Born in San Antonio and reared in Dallas, he obtained his bachelor of arts from Southern Methodist University in 1968 and graduated with high honors in 1971 from the University of Texas School of Law, where he was a member of Order of the Coif, an associate editor of the Texas Law Review, and Grand Chancellor of his class.

Grable's legal practice consists largely of representing clients in litigation and administrative hearings involving various facets of the oil and gas industry. He has represented independent producers, major oil companies, pipelines, and royalty owners in a wide variety of litigation in state and federal trial and appellate courts and before state and federal administrative agencies. He is counsel of record in over thirty appellate decisions, including five significant oil and gas opinions of the Texas Supreme Court, in all of which he represented the prevailing party.

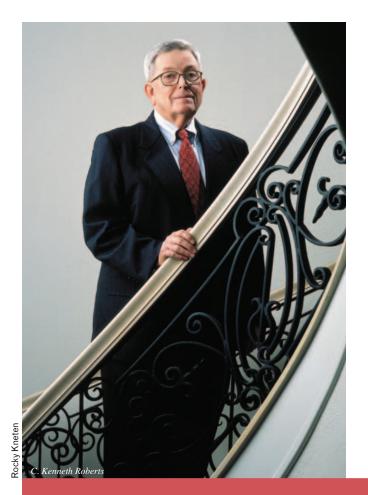

Although Grable's practice principally involves legal matters arising in domestic on-shore activities, he also has represented clients in certain aspects of international oil and gas operations, including government concessions and operations in Europe and the Middle East.

Besides his successful legal practice, Grable is an avid golfer, and he has far-ranging interests in the visual and performing arts, horticulture, and travel. "Bob is Jeffersonian in the breadth and depth of his curiosity, intellect, and involvement in the world around him," said Dean Lawrence Sager. "I am proud that he is an alumnus of UT Law School, and grateful that he is using his formidable talents in the service of our school. I very much look forward to working with him."

Grable assumes the presidency of the Foundation Board at a time of great promise and opportunity for the Law School. As part of UT-Austin's upcoming capital campaign, UT Law will launch the most ambitious fundraising effort in its history to secure its position and its future as one of the nation's elite centers of legal education. Grable and the entire Foundation Board of Trustees will be on the leading edge of this critically important enterprise.

In addition to his service to the Law School, Grable is a member of the McDonald Observatory and Astronomy Board of Visitors at The University of Texas at Austin. He is also a member of the University's Development Board and the Chancellor's Council Executive Committee for the UT System. Grable is a former Chairman and member of the Management Committee of the Texas Ballet Theatre. He and his wife, Marty, live in Fort Worth, Texas, and have two grown children.

A Tribute to C. Kenneth Roberts

KEN ROBERTS, '51, PRESIDENT of The University of Texas Law School Foundation for the past two years and its vice-president for the preceding four years, will step down from his current office in November 2007. He will continue to serve as a trustee of the Foundation. Roberts, who joined the Board as a Life Member Trustee in 1993, has also served on the organization's Executive Committee and as chair of its Audit Committee. Roberts is credited with clarifying and strengthening the accounting and administrative practices and procedures of the Foundation, improving the position of the Law School's permanent endowment (which the Foundation Board oversees) in a volatile marketplace, and better equipping the Board as a whole to perform its fiduciary responsibilities.

"Ken's business and professional background with Exxon Mobil made him of invaluable assistance to me during my four years as President of the Foundation," said David Beck, '65, who preceded Roberts as president. "In addition, during his tenure as president, his good judgment and dedication to our law school guided us as we faced some difficult issues. It seems like he was always traveling to Austin to make certain that the Foundation was operating on a sound business basis. He has done a terrific job for us."

Roberts earned his undergraduate degree in business from UT-Austin then graduated from The University of Texas School of Law in 1951 and received his Masters of Law in 1953, also from UT. Following service with the U.S. Army, he joined the Exxon Company, USA (then Humble Oil) Law Department in Houston in 1954. In 1979, he was named General Counsel of Exxon USA in Houston and in 1992, he became Vice President and General Counsel of Exxon Corporation in Dallas, retiring in 1995.

Roberts has served as Chairman of API's General Committee on Law, a member of the Board of Directors of Landmark Legal Foundation, and a member of the Board of the Institute on Court Management and the National Center for State Courts. He is a member of the Association of General Counsel, and a member of the Board of the American Arbitration Association. He is also a Fellow of the American and Texas Bar Foundations.

In 1993, Roberts received the Outstanding Alumnus Award from The University of Texas Law Alumni Association. In 2005, the Law School recognized Roberts and his wife, Cary, BA '50, with the dedication of the Cary and Kenneth Roberts Seminar Room. In addition to their many years of volunteer service to the Law School, the Roberts' generosity has been longstanding and abundant. They have contributed a significant amount of their personal fortune to the work of the Law School over the last several decades.

"We are grateful beyond measure to Cary and Ken for their generosity and service to the Law School," said Dean Lawrence Sager. "I have great respect for Ken's devotion to our school and for his willingness to spend both his time and his treasure in advancing the interests of, and supporting the ambitions we have for, UT Law."—TH

Contributors, Contributors The Law School's alumni and friends are essential to our continued success. Thank you for your continued investment in The University of Texas School of Law.

Center for Women in Law

THE UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS SCHOOL OF LAW announces the establishment of a new center focused on issues affecting women law students and women lawyers. The brainchild of six UT Law alumni—Linda Addison, '76, Nina Cortell, '76, Sylvia de Leon, '76, Laura Hagen, '76, Vicki Land, '76, and Martha Smiley, '72—the Center now has thirty women who have each pledged $50,000 to create this first-of-its-kind resource at any American law school.

The Center for Women in Law will bring together experienced women lawyers, academicians, public officials, and other professionals to foster professional development through training and mentoring; enhance networking and career advancement; establish and promote best practices for law firms, businesses, and other professional organizations for the advancement and retention of women; provide a center for academic research; and support women lawyers as they advance in their careers.

Jo Anna Dale

THE LAW SCHOOL thanks Jo Anna Dale, widow of John Richard Dale III, BA, '47, LLB, '50, for her gift of $1 million to establish the Richard Dale Endowed Chair in Law. John Dale died in 2006 at the age of eighty. Born in Lufkin, Texas, he was a resident of Independence, Missouri at the time of his death, having spent the majority of his career as an attorney with the Social Security Administration in Kansas City, and later in the Inspector General's Office of the Health Care Financing Administration. Mr. and Mrs. Dale, married for more than thirty-five years, were active in Democratic Party politics and in their community.

Dean Lawrence Sager had the opportunity to thank Mrs. Dale in person when he visited her in Missouri earlier this year. Her love for her late husband has manifested itself in a most generous gift to the Law School that provides a permanent tribute to a life lived in service of the law and rewards superior scholarship within the law faculty.

Wayne A. Reaud

THE LAW SCHOOL expresses its gratitude for a $2 million gift from Wayne A. Reaud through the Beaumont Foundation of America. Half of this gift created the Gilbert I. "Buddy" Low Endowed Scholarship, and the remaining $1 million was donated to complete the funding of the Judge Robert M. Parker Chair in Law and to increase the size of the Judge Robert M. Parker Endowed Presidential Scholarship. This generous gift helps the Law School provide support for first-class research and scholarship, and for student legal education.

Reaud is the founder of the law firm of Reaud, Morgan & Quinn and is known throughout the legal community as a champion of working men and women. He received his law degree from Texas Tech University in 1974. Reaud is a former member of the Lamar University Board of Regents, a former director of the Texas Trial Lawyers Association, and a past president of the Southeast Texas Trial Lawyers Association. He is a life fellow of the Texas Bar Association, a fellow of the International Society of Barristers, and is listed in Best Lawyers in America.

Baron & Budd Public Interest Scholarships

SIX UT LAW STUDENTS have been selected to receive Baron & Budd Public Interest Scholarships for the 2007–2008 academic year. The scholarship provides financial support to students who commit to working 300 pro bono hours with a non-profit organization providing legal services to underserved individuals or communities.

The scholarships provide a $4,000 stipend and are made possible by a generous gift from the Baron & Budd law firm. They are administered by the William Wayne Justice Center for Public Interest Law at the Law School.

"We are proud to support these students as they increase access to justice in our community," said Eden Harrington, Director of the Justice Center. "Baron & Budd has provided our students with the chance to gain valuable experience while contributing 1800 hours of legal work to low-income Texans, and the Law School is very grateful for the firm's support."

The following students were selected to receive Baron & Budd Public Interest Scholarships:

Whitney Hill, '09, will work with Advocacy, Inc., a nonprofit organization dedicated to protecting and advocating for the legal rights of Texans with disabilities. She will perform legal research on Medicaid issues and help represent children with disabilities suffering from abuse and neglect. Last summer Hill clerked for Texas RioGrande Legal Aid in Austin.

Kate Lincoln-Goldfinch, '08, will work with the Political Asylum Project of Austin, a nonprofit dedicated to promoting justice for immigrants and refugees by providing free and low cost legal services and education. She will work with individuals seeking asylum. Lincoln-Goldfinch spent last summer working as a law clerk for PAPA.

Kevin Little, '09, will work with the Texas Civil Rights Project, a nonprofit organization that advocates for racial, social, and economic equality in Texas through education and litigation. Little will perform legal research and writing on civil rights issues and interview potential clients. Last summer, Little interned with Judge William Wayne Justice and Magistrate Judge Andrew W. Austin, both of the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas in Austin.

Meghan Shapiro, '09, will work for the Texas Defender Service, a nonprofit law firm dedicated to representing indigent men and women on Texas' death row. She will assist in researching and drafting pleadings in cases pending before state and federal courts, the U.S. Supreme Court, and the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles. Last summer, Shapiro worked on capital cases in TDS's Houston office and with the Equal Justice Initiative of Alabama. Before attending law school, she participated in the ABA's Death Penalty Moratorium Project.

Mi Hui Tsai, '09, will work for the Capital Area AIDS Legal Project, which provides free legal services to low-income people with HIV/AIDS. She will help review cases, assist with legal research, and participate in special legal clinics intended to empower women with HIV/AIDS. Tsai worked at CAALP last summer.

Kevin Vela, '08, will work with the Equal Justice Center, a nonprofit organization that assists low-income families, individuals, and communities with employment and civil rights issues. He will assist clients to recover unpaid wages. Last spring and summer, Vela participated in the Law School's Transnational Worker Rights Clinic at the EJC.

Baron & Budd PC is one of the largest plaintiffs' firms in the country representing people exposed to toxic substances in their work and living environments. The firm established the Baron & Budd Public Interest Scholarships at UT Law School to support students engaged in pro bono work.

The William Wayne Justice Center at UT Law is dedicated to promoting equal justice for all through legal education. The Justice Center works toward this goal by educating students and attorneys about public interest issues through conferences, research projects, and clinical courses; by encouraging all students to participate in pro bono and public interest law throughout their careers; and by creating public service opportunities for students and graduates.

Sunflower Society Seeds a New Generation of Giving

CHARTER MEMBERS of the Law Alumni Association's Sunflower Society from the Class of 2003 have seen the donor recognition society blossom during the term of their three-year commitment. Now, they challenge their classmates to help grow the Annual Fund even larger by stepping up to become Keeton Fellows.

The Sunflower Society, which germinated with the Class of 2003, recognizes graduating law students who pledge to contribute $600 over the three years following graduation ($100 the first year, $200 the second, and $300 the third). Members of the Society receive a personalized brick installed in a special section of the Law School breezeway and an invitation to the annual donor's reception hosted by the Dean.

A Class of 2003 committee will be contacting their classmates in the coming months. The committee, chaired by Milam Newby, includes Steve Butter, Mary Emma (Partain) Civins, Conor Civins, Scott Cook, and David Lang. They will encourage classmates to join them in progressing to the Keeton Fellows.

The Keeton Fellows program honors the late W. Page Keeton, nationally renowned torts scholar and dean of UT Law School for a quarter century. Keeton Fellows are invited to an annual event hosted by the Dean, receive a token of appreciation appropriate for display, and have their names permanently added to the Keeton Fellows plaque at the Law School. Donations through the Keeton Fellows program, as with those through the Sunflower Society, are directed to the Annual Fund.

The Annual Fund, consisting solely of alumni donations, is used to benefit those Law School programs deemed by the Dean to be most in need. Recipients of Annual Fund support include individual students and student organizations, as well as clinics, journals, and programs that exist for student support, such as career services.

For more information on the Annual Fund and the Keeton Fellows program, visit http://www.utexas.edu/law/depts/alumni/annual_giving.html.

REFLECTIONS OF GREATNESS

Right for the Roses - BCS College National Championship 2007 Original Serigraph by Rick Rush. Image size is 22 x 30 inches.

Since 1954, three-generations of our family at ALLART FRAMING & GALLERY have pursued a singular vision of timeless design combined with superb craftsmanship to produce distinctive, museum-quality frames for the discriminating Texan.

A Family Tradition of Personal Attention and Exquisite Craftsmanship

On January 4th, 2006, at the Rose Bowl in Pasadena, California, things for the University of Texas' football team could not have been more right and greatness took place. America's sports artist Rick Rush has captured the thrill of this victory over the University of Southern California in his original serigraph series entitled "Right for the Roses."

This hand-made serigraph is available in an extremely limited edition of only 300 prints. Overall (unframed) size is 29 1/2 x 37 inches. Each serigraph is hand-signed and numbered by the artist.
